

CONTRIBUTORS

Robrecht Deforche is a candidate, MA, in International Development. University of Kent, Brussels Campus.

Andrew Duffield, MSc from the London School of Economics and Political Science, is specialist in the area of International development. Currently, he lives and works in Lusaka, Zambia. With a business consultancy venture focused on helping businesses that create “social value.” He has previous work experience with an African-focused boutique business intelligence firm, Songhai Advisory LLP, as well as prior assignments in the humanitarian field with the United Kingdom’s Department for International development (DFID) and the United Nations World Food Programme. He has written previously for the Canadian-based Centre for International Governance Innovation, as well as the e-magazine, Generation C. He was born and raised in Guelph, Ontario, Canada.

Laura Hammond is Head of the Department of Development Studies, School of African and Oriental Studies, University of London. An anthropologist, she writes on the Horn of Africa where her primary concerns include food Security, conflict, and forced migration. She is the author of This Place Will Become Home: Refugee Repatriation to Ethiopia, Cornell University Press, 2004, as well as several book chapter and journal articles.

Paivi Harinen, Doctor of Social Sciences, works as an acting professor for Sociology at the University of Eastern Finland. Her main research interests consist of questions dealing with young people’s societal and cultural membership as well general issues of citizenship and equality in different social surroundings.

Ville-Samuli Haverinen, M.Soc.Sc., is a junior research fellow at the Department of Social Sciences at the University of Eastern Finland. Currently, Haverinen is a member of a four-year research project called Contexts of Diaspora Citizenship, with focus on Somalis in Finland and the United States of America. In addition, he is making progress on his doctoral dissertation that is analyzing different political-juridical surroundings in Finland and the United States that faces Somali immigrants and their civic participation and transnational identities.

Marko Kananen, Doctor of Social Sciences, is a researcher at Juvenia—Youth and Development Centre at the Mikkeli University of Applied Sciences, and currently, a visiting scholar of the University of Minnesota. His research interests include immigration, civic participation and transnational identities.

Jussi Ronkainen, Doctor of Social Sciences, is a research director at Juvenia—Youth Research and Development Centre, Mikkeli University of Applied Sciences. He is a coordinator of the research project Contexts of Diaspora Citizenship (Somalis in Finland and the USA, 2012–2016). Ronkainen’s field research interests include sociology of citizenship.

Nasir Warfa is Senior Lecturer at Queen Mary University, London. Specializing in migration and mental health, his research interests include qualitative and quantitative investigations, with particular attention to the social and psychological wellbeing of refugee populations and ethnic minority communities. Warfa has published many articles and book chapters. He has received research funding from the EU’s Directorate-General for Health and Consumer Protection. He is a faculty affiliate of the Harvard University Programme in Refugee Trauma.

Professor Warfa is organizing a special 2015/16 volume of Bildhaan that will address issues that pertain to mental health and migration.